

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

A network address of a network to which an Internet telephone is connected is registered in a RAM. When an operator inputs an extension number of a destination terminal (an Internet telephone) that is connected to the same network, a CPU combines the registered network address in the RAM and the input extension number in order to generate an IP address. Based on this IP address, a call is placed to the destination terminal (the Internet telephone) of the extension number.